

Pat Farrell:

I personally view this as part of our responsibility, not as lawyers, as members of this community. These kids, not through their own fault, have had some rough bumps along the way. I am a father, a grandfather, an attorney, and now I primarily mediate civil disputes. Expectations were candidly something, a little different from the pro bono work I had been doing. It interested me to be able to work with kids and hopefully try to make a difference in their life.

Pat Farrell:

If you're looking as an attorney to do pro bono work, it's a great way to do it. Particularly, if you love kids, and who doesn't? To see that they ultimately realize that I was going to be there and it was somebody that they could contact, or when I told them I'd see them next month, that I really did show up and was there. I ended up in a five-year period, this young lady was moved probably 15 times from different houses to different houses. I think they are entitled to be nurtured like any other child is.
